

Intern Singing Bee Gees During Code

What began as a routine code on the dialysis unit turned euphonic this past Wednesday morning after new intern Rob Eide began audibly singing 'Staying Alive' by the Bee Gees while administering chest compressions.

"At first, it was just some quiet humming and I ignored it while trying to dig out epi from the crash cart," recalled pharmacist Charlie Denes.

"Within a minute, though, I could hear his 'ah, ah, ah, ah, staying alive!' more clearly than the Team Lead." Reportedly, young Dr Eide also ventured away from the established refrain and began attempting the song's verses, where to his eternal credit he absolutely nailed the lyrics despite a less than mellifluous falsetto.

Still "his timing and depth were spot on, actually" Denes noted. "He really did a good job. I even joined in on the singing later on. In fact, it was probably one of the funnest codes I've been on in years."

Time of death was 1135.
